You have decided to raise your family and welcome your pet into the fold. Before you go to a pet store (or, better yet, an adoption center), there are a ton of things to consider. And most importantly to determine what type of animal you will receive. If there are kids involved, it means figuring out the best pets for kids because it's not always as copasetic as TV makes it to be. While there is no guarantee that a certain type of animal is ideal for your child, it is important to consider your child's personality traits first. Are they active, home-buried, smart, quiet or playful children? By matching your child's character with similar animal type traits you'll receive, the two should get along pretty nicely. To truly create a human-animal bond, performance must be mutual, veterinarian Dr Liz Bales told Woman's Day. They will best fulfill your needs when you fulfill your needs, then magic happens with a lifelong connection. But that's not the only thing you need to consider as a parent. Each type of animal has different costs and obligations, and it is important to understand the needs and lifespan of your new pet. Once you have chosen the best pet for your child, this will be one of the most fulfilling and valuable life lessons they will ever have. They will learn responsibility, patience, care and, most importantly, love. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) regulates what can cat food, bag dog food, or a box of dog treats or snacks in the pantry. Fda regulation of pet food is similar to other animal products. The Federal Food, Medicines and Cosmetics Act (FFDCA) requires that all animal products, such as human food, be safe to eat, produce in sanitary conditions, contain no harmful substances and are truthfully labeled. In addition, canned pet food must be processed in accordance with low-acid canning rules to ensure that pets are food free of viable microorganisms, see Section 21 of the Federal Rules Code, Part 113 (21 CFR 113). FDA Regulation Pet Food There is no requirement that pet food have prior FDA market approval. However, the FDA ensures that the ingredients used in pet food are safe and have an appropriate function in pet food. Many ingredients such as meat, poultry and grain are considered safe and do not require pre-prog. Other substances such as minerals, vitamins or other nutrients flavors, preservatives or processors may be deemed safe (GRAS) for intended use (21 CFR 582 and 584) or must be approved as food additives (21 CFR 570, 571 and 573). Coloring books must have permission for this use, specified in 21 CFR 70, and be listed in parts 73, 74 or 81. For more information on pet food and Pet feed, see Pet Food Labeling is regulated on two levels. Current FDA regulations require proper product identification, a net statement amount, the name and location of the manufacturer or distributor's business, and the proper listing of all ingredients in the product in order to be from most to least, weight-based. Some states also enforce their own labeling rules. Many of these rules are based on a model provided by the Association of American Feed Control Officials (AAFCO). For more information about AAFCO, please visit its website. For more information on labeling requirements, see the FDA also considering specific claims to pet food, such as urinary health support, low magnesium, and hairball control. A data collection guide to make urinary tract health claims is available in Guide 55 on the CVM part of the FDA website. CVM DOES NOT recommend one product over another or offers recommendations on individual pet health issues that are usually provided by an animal veterinarian. Issues regarding the health of your pets and/or specific use of any veterinary drug, pet food, or other product should always be referred to your veterinarian.
